Not for Sale (notforsalecampaign.org) is a grassroots movement to stop slavery and human trafficking through projects on the ground in Cambodia, Thailand, Honduras, Uganda (left) and Peru. Jamee Herbert '10 and Matthew Harper '11 became involved in the effort last year.

NOT FOR SALE, a California-based organization dedicated to establishing a grassroots effort to “re-abolish” slavery and eradicate human trafficking across the world, recently recognized Matthew Harper '11 for his work researching trafficking patterns in Cambodia and raising $1,600 to help shine a light on the problems of modern-day slavery in that area. “I know that no amount of money will solve the horrors many find themselves trapped in,” he says, adding that he is committed to examining the root causes of Cambodian trafficking and investigating possible solutions.

Harper was introduced to Not For Sale by classmate, friend and NFS Connecticut state director Jamee Herbert '10, who volunteered for NFS with rescued children in Lima while studying abroad in Peru in 2009.

Herbert is pleased that the group is off to a good start at Holy Cross, collaborating with other student organizations to bring events and displays to campus and getting the fledgling Holy Cross Coalition for Students Against Human Trafficking off the ground.

HIP HOP SYMPOSIUM

Students from Worcester’s North High and South High schools came to campus this spring for a Hip Hop Symposium, a collaborative effort by Margaret A. Post '96, director of the Donelan Office of Community-Based Learning, and Daniel DiCenso '98 (shown here with students), visiting instructor of music. The students engaged in college-level discussions of the cultural influence of hip hop. The event also encouraged the students to think about how college might be part of their futures.
